FRIDAY EVENING, SEPTR. 14

The Eccentricities of De Quincey. I remember him coming to Gloucester place (an Elinburgh abode of Professor Wilson,) one stormy night. He remained hour after hour in vain expectation that the waters would assuage and the hurley burley cease. There was nothing for it but that our visitor should remain all pight. The professor ordered a room to be prewas prolonged, without further difficulty, for the greater part of the year. During this visit some of his eccentricities did not escape observation. For example, he rarely appeared at the family meals, preferring to dine in his own room, at his own hour, not unfrequently turning night into day. His tastes were very simple, though a little trouble some, at least to the servant who prepared his repast. Coffee, boiled rice and milk, and a piece of mutton from the loin, were the materials that invariably formed his diet. The cook, who had an audience with him daily, received her instructions in silent awe, quite overpowered by his manner, for had he been addressing a duchess he could searcely have spoken with more deference.

He would couch his request in such terms as these :- "Owing to dyspepsia afflicting my system, and the possibility of any additional disarrangement of the stomach taking place, consequences incalculably distressing would arise, so much so, indeed, as to increase nervous irritation, and prevent me from attending to matters of overwhelming importance, if you do not remember to cut the mutton in a diagonal rather than a longitudinal form. The cook, a Scotch woman, had great reverence for Mr. De Quincey as a man of genius; but after one of these interviews her patience was pretty well ex-hausted, and she would say, "Weel, I never heard the like o' that in a' my days; the bedie has an awfu' sicht o' words. It it had been my ain master that was wanting his dinner he would ha' ordered a hale tablefu' wi' little mair than a waff o' his haun, and here's a' this claver about a bit mutton nae bigger than a prin. Mr. De Quinshey would mak's gran' proacher, though I'm thinking a hantle o' the folk wouldnaken what he was driving at." Betty's observation were made with considerable self-satisfaction, as she considered her insight o. Mr. De Quincey's character by no means slight, and many wore the quaint remarks she made, sometimes hitting upon a truth that entitled her to that shrewd sort of discrimination by no means uncommon in the humble ranks of Scottish life But these little mea's were not the only indulgences that, when not properly attended to, brought trouble to Mr. De Quincey. Regularity in doses of opium was even of greater consequence. An ounce of landanum per diem prostrated animal life in the early part of the day. It was no unfrequent sight to find him in his room, lying upon the rug in front of the fire, his head resting upon a book, with his arms crossed over his breast, plunged in profound slumber. For several hours he would lie in this state, until the officets of the torper had passed away. Thatime when he was most brilliant was generally toward the early morning hour, and than, more than once, in order to show him off, my father arranged his supper parties, so that, sitting till three or four in the morning, he brought Mr. De Quincey to that point at which, in charm and power of conversation, he was so truly won-

Pec's Posthumous Poem. Not to be outdone in enterprise by a Kokomo paper, the Herald dispatched a correspondent to Virginia, with instructions to spare neither time nor expense in the effort to capture a posthumous poem by the gifted but erratic Poc. After an absence of nearly two weeks, he sends us the poetic fragment given below, with the explanation that he discovered it written in chalk on the inner side of a barn door, on the premises of an old farmer living pear Winchester. One night, the farmer says, a young man with wild and beery look applied at his house for lodgings, and was given accommodations in the baro. At daybreak next morning, when the old man went out to feed his stock, the stranger was gone, and the following poem, with Poe's initials attached, was found written on the barn door: Mary Ann her parents named her, But she wrote it Marienne; And though angels have not claimed her.

> She's as fair as any. For her eyes are dark and gloomy, And her nose is sort o' bloomy, And her mouth is rather roomy-And have angels whispered to me, ."Marienne?" No. not any.

With pale star light lustre gleaming. Hovered o'er the fair and dreaming Marienne. But my dream of life is breken, And my tale of love unspoken; For with gloomy eyes wide open, Leaving neither sigh nor token, She eloped with a fancy fellow, One whose hair was long and yellow.

When fantastic shapes and shadows

Danced in darkling glens and meadows,

Fairies gay and bright and beaming,

And his head both thick and mellow; And do you think that I shall pellow For Marienne? E. A. P. Nary any. The asterisks in the poem, it may be as well to explain, represent a gap made by the farmer inadvertently backing up against the barn door to scratch his back. The beautiful thoughts thus obliverated are forever lost to the literary world. Jealousy may impel some of our contemporaries to insist that the poem would have been vastly improved if the farmer had wiped out the whole production, but they cannot conscientiously declare that our poem by Poo does'nt contain more sense to the square inch than the Kokomo effort. The Herald correspondent wished to send us the entire barn door as a guarantee of his good faith, but the farmer objected. He secured one of the hinges, however, which any one who doubts the genuineness of "Marienne" can see by calling at his residence. - Norristown Herald.
